In order to study the microtubule cytoskeleton of Xenopus early embryos, we have developed a fluorescence microscopy assay that allows one to distinguish between intact and damaged microtubules. A combination of the fluorescent dyes fluorescein and rhodamine is used to detect polysomes and microtubules in intact eggs. In damaged eggs we observe fluorescein-positive polysomes, rhodamine-positive microtubules and microtubules connected to polysomes. This combination of fluorescein and rhodamine is injected into oocytes at the 4-cell stage. When their fertilized eggs are cultured in the presence of 5 microM colcemid for 30 min, microtubules and most polysomes are labelled with fluorescein, but a few are not. I've been using a NES Classic for a while now and really like it. It's the only one I've owned with the controller ports and it includes a memory card. It plays most games fine and the controller feels really good. I'm a little surprised the battery is so low on it - maybe I'll find myself wishing it had a USB type-A port (or a cable) instead of this PowerBank-like thing. That said, there's a ton of good stuff on that site - N64 and 32-bit Wii games all available for free. It would be cool if Nintendo took their old games and made an emulator to play them on the NES Classic. For example, one of my favorites is Captain N: The Game Master. It's a Super Nintendo game that was only released in Japan. It has a cool soundtrack and awesome character designs. It would be pretty awesome to own a "Nintendo" version of that game and play it on my NES Classic. If you happen to know any sites where I can play that game, let me know. I'd love to play that game. Manual Circuit Visualizer The official Windows emulator for the NES Classic, plays all games from the classic NES console. It is about 10x as fast as the homebrew version of the NES Classic.
